1. The effect or influence of an international court decision within a domestic legal system may be conditioned by any of several variables. Among these are internal and external political exigencies and pressures, the cogency or pertinence of a judgment, an internal openness or even need for definitive international authority or guidance to resolve an issue, and a general willingness to accept a judicial solution of the issue. Underlying all of these variables, however, are the foundations and requirements of unwritten constitutionalism or a written constitution...
